1. The buildup of Soviet forces on the China Border, an event of major significance, was in an extremely early phase when elements of the buildup were detected from photography in early 1966 at NPIC. However, the evidence was subtle and elusive, consisting of minute bits and pieces such as limited expansion of existing facilities, increases in equipment, and introduction of new equipment. Its significance was recognized by two imagery interpreters, a specialist on ground forces installations.

resourcefully addressed themselves to the problem of proving their interpretation. They began a painstaking watch of small-scale search photography for the minute indicators of change. In reporting out individual developments in 1966 and 1967, they persisted in their interpretation that a major buildup was beginning. They pressed for the collection of further evidence. Where changes were found or suspected they pursued requests for high-resolution photography and for successive coverage. Long before the full magnitude of the buildup became obvious, they convinced NPIC officials of its significance. As subsequent photography revealed an accelerating buildup and the extreme importance of this situation became clearer within NPIC, they were formed into a two-man team to correlate and assemble their evidence in comprehensive form. They prepared their team briefings on the buildup, presenting their findings in at least 40 briefings which served to alert the intelligence community. They briefed high-level officials of the intelligence community. The alertness and professionalism of [ through their briefings and reports successfully conveyed the significance and magnitude of the Soviet buildup.
